Breast surgery may lead to significant blood loss throughout the perioperative phase.

Tranexamic acid (TXA) is a lysine derivative, which exhibits an antifibrinolytic effect and prevents blood loss.

This study evaluates the postoperative effect of TXA in breast surgery.

The findings of this study provide a foundation for conducting further research on the benefits of using TXA to improve breast surgery outcomes.